JobCentral.com Builds A Corporate Following

BY DONNA HOWELL
INVESTOR'S BUSINESS DAILY

Wanted: the best candidates at the lowest cost. Must be willing to relocate online job-search to new Web site.

Fed up with the growing costs of commercial job-hunting sites such as Monster.com, (MNST) many corporations are banding together on their own job board, JobCentral.com.

The site lists about 750,000 jobs, nearly double the listings at Monster.com, says Bill Warren, executive director of the DirectEmployers Association, the nonprofit parent of the JobCentral National Labor Exchange.

"The employers are getting involved and having control over their own destiny in the online industry," Warren said. "I think what will happen very quickly is we'll be a leader in the job board industry."

Most Fortune 500 companies already are members of the association. They spend about $15,000 a year to post all open jobs at JobCentral.com vs. the $700,000 to $800,000 Warren says for-profit job boards could cost. Nonmembers can post ads at JobCentral.com for $25 each per month.

Warren started the first online jobs service, Online Career Center, in the early 1990s. When TMP Worldwide (now Monster Worldwide) bought OCC, he became president of the Monster.com unit. In 2002, Warren went to work for DirectEmployers. It was then a fledgling effort by IBM, (IBM) General Electric Co., (GE) Intel, (INTC) Unisys (UIS) and 17 other firms.

Warren doesn't see outfits like Monster, CareerBuilder.com and HotJobs going away. But he does see firms with jobs to fill growing more empowered. And in
